1. Read the following passage and answer the questions given below:

The Spartans were a strange people – strange because they put honesty before cleverness, health before wealth, courage before cunning, and strength before all. They lived in the south of Greece over twenty centuries ago, but their fame is known throughout the west even today. This is because they wanted to be fine men, and not rich men, -- because they wanted to do things, and not to have things, -- and because they wanted what was good for mind, body and soul, and not what was pleasant. To this day we call a man a Spartan if we wish to say that he knows how to deny himself what he wants, that he is strong in character, and that he 'eats to live' rather than 'lives to eat'. The Spartans were better than the other Greeks because they had better aims. When the rest of Greece was trying to get rich and live in luxury and splendour, Sparta was trying to get strong, and live in such a way as should be the very best for mind, body and soul.
